

Weekly Review—February 7, 2025

Monetary Policy

At last week's policy meeting, the Fed left its benchmark rate unchanged due in part to the uncertainty associated with the new Administration's policies and their potential impact on the economy. The Fed's policy statement as well as the Fed Chair's post-meeting comments signaled their shifting concern from a weakening jobs market back to inflation; thus, further supporting their no change policy stance. According to Chairman Powell, the strong economy combined with labor market stability allows the Fed to maintain rates "meaningfully" above neutral – in hopes of keeping downward pressure on prices. Powell told reporters several times during the press conference that policy makers "are in no hurry to move into the next phase of rate cuts."

The Labor Market

January's employment report showed that although the increase in non-farm payrolls missed street estimates, the unexpected decline in the headline rate combined with stronger than expected average hourly earnings will likely keep policy makers on the sidelines over the near term.

Looking back, the stability in the labor market over the last year has largely been driven by the strength in the education & health care and government sectors – those industries that are generally sheltered from changes in economic conditions. (Case in point: January's employment data showed that last month's job growth was largely a function of increases in health care and government jobs.) The growth in the above-mentioned non-cyclical sectors runs counter to the weakness in more cyclical industries such as construction, manufacturing and professional services. While the U.S. jobs engine doesn't necessarily hit on all cylinders/sectors equally, the concern is that if the current non-cyclical drivers begin to slow, what sectors are going to pick up the slack? If none do, the labor market will materially weaken.
